REFLECTION

In my HTML project, I created a structured travel gallery that included destination names, descriptions, images, activity tables, travel steps (using ordered lists), and 3-day itineraries (using unordered lists). I used the <img> tag with alt attributes for accessibility and controlled the image sizes and layout using inline styles.

I organized content using a combination of lists and tables for clarity, and applied headings, padding, and spacing to separate sections visually. I used the <section> tag to group related content like each destination, which helped make the layout more semantic, readable, and accessible. It also improved the structure for both screen readers and developers.

I maintained code readability through consistent indentation and proper HTML tag usage. I aligned text and images using basic inline styling to keep the layout clean without relying on external CSS.

One of my main struggles was designing the webpage visually, since I'm not confident with design. Making everything look neat and balanced with just HTML and inline styles was a challenge, but it helped me better understand how design and structure work together.

Through this activity, I learned how to layout content effectively using only HTML, while improving my skills in semantic structuring, formatting, and visual presentation.
