REFLECTION

Creating this HTML calendar was a detailed and time-consuming process, mostly because I had to manually copy-paste the code for each month and adjust the position of the days to align them correctly. It took a lot of patience to make sure each month's dates started on the right day and didn't mess up the layout.

I structured the entire HTML document using basic semantic elements like , <table>, and heading tags to keep everything organized. Each month was placed inside its own table, and all months were grouped in a flexible grid layout using a flex container. This let me arrange up to 4 months per row, which made it visually neat and responsive.

To organize the calendar itself, I used tables with 7 columns (Sunday to Saturday). Each month has a <thead> for day labels and a <tbody> for the actual dates. I had to manually insert empty <td> tags to shift the days when a month didn't start on Sunday, which was one of the most tedious parts.

I used different background colors to highlight special days like holidays, Sundays, and my birthday. For example, dark red for regular holidays, light pink for special working holidays, light blue for Singapore holidays, and so on. I also added a legend using  elements and styled them inline so it's easy to see what each color means.

Aside from basic tags, I explored others like <hr>, <h3>, and  to improve presentation. I also relied on inline styles like min-width, border-radius, and padding for better design since I didn't use a separate CSS file.

The biggest challenge was that HTML alone is really limiting. I couldn't add any interactive features or dynamic generation of dates. Everything had to be static and manually input, which took a lot of effort and left room for mistakes.

From this activity, I learned how to build a full calendar using only HTML and how to apply inline styling effectively. If I were to improve it, I'd definitely use CSS for cleaner styling and JavaScript to generate the calendar dynamically, especially to allow switching between years or filtering by holiday types.
